Well, it was no different to any other say, you know what I mean? There was no bombing or nothing and you just heard on the radio war been declared. I suppose, being a young boy you didn't take it in too much, you know. So – so it's hard to say. It's not until the bombing started then you realised how bad it was, you know. In fact, I was more scared in the bombing then I was on active service because you was trapped in a house. On active service you could see what's happening all around [laughs].
